Autism as an Evolutionary Process

Suzy Miller

According to the Center for Disease Control's (CDC) 2018 statistics, one in fifty-nine individuals received a diagnosis of Autism Spectrum Disorder (ASD). In the 1980s the incidence of ASD was reported to be one in ten thousand. I quote these statistics, not to give any authority to the information provided by the CDC, since how they arrived at these numbers is complicated, but merely to point out that statistics relating to those on the spectrum have increased significantly in the last 20 years.

Many argue that with such a staggering increase of children displaying the characteristic challenges of ASD in the areas of communication, behavior, socialization and the inability to be present to their surroundings, humanity must be "going downhill."

But what if, far from a sign that something is "wrong," the fact that so many children function differently than previous generations is, instead, irrefutable evidence that humankind is making an evolutionary leap, and that these new populations are evidence of the emergence of a new human being?

To be clear, I do not just believe this to be the case; but have twenty-plus years of accumulated evidence to back it up. Of course, one has to ask, what constitutes "evolution?" In my world, evolution is naturally expressed as humans open to more of who they are and express from that state for the well-being of the collective.

I have been working with children diagnosed with autism and their families, initially as pediatric Speech-Language Pathologist, and now as a telepathic communicator, multidimensional seer and integration specialist, since 1999. Based on everything I have seen and heard, this population functions in ways the rest of humanity has yet to evolve into.

They are trying to remind us of the skill sets that lie beyond our programming, and they push us to leave behind what no longer serves. Skills such as telepathy, multidimensional awareness, access to subtle body information, the ability to feel our way through life versus think our way through, and most importantly, our capacity to love as a way of being. These are just some of the skills they reflect as being available for all.

Back in 1999, while working as a Speech-Language Pathologist, I became personally aware that not only were many autistic children communicating (both verbally and non-verbally) about subtle energy information; they also seemed to be deeply interconnected to other autistics as well as the human population as a whole. The more of them I interacted with, the more I saw a common thread in the contribution they were trying to make.

In my first interactions with the Collective Consciousness of the Children (CCC), I asked why there were so many on the spectrum. The CCC share that there was a collective unconscious request sent out from humanity in the late 70s and 80s for souls to incarnate with access to as much information as possible, to shift the patriarchal influence to a more intuitive dynamic, to open humanity and long-buried skills sets, to move beyond the limitations of familial lineage patterns and programming, and to create a base

I understand this plight on a personal level as well because from my first interaction with those on the spectrum, they have been helping me integrate their awareness and experience. I can only say that if coming into this reality is as challenging as coherently expanding into their worlds is, then they have my utmost admiration. Anyone who has tried to integrate large downloads of information, one after the other, knows just what I am talking about.

To make their experience a bit more challenging, the CCC suggests that many of the souls that present with this diagnosis have not incarnated on this for heart-centered creation. I was overwhelmed just hearing this so I cannot imagine how each of them feels having been born into that request.

Before we go further, let's first address telepathy, which is how I receive a lot of my information from this population.

Scientists have proven that autistics are much more likely to be telepathic than the average human. It is also the case that just as many blind people develop heightened senses of touch and sound, autistics possess heightened gifts in that all of their sense are open. In the world of physics, everything is energy and energy is information. My experience indicates that this population actually sees, hears, touches, tastes and yes, even smells more acutely. From the physics perspective, they have access to more information than those who are considered neurotypical. With so much information available moment by moment, it is understandable that the vast majority of their challenges, including odd behaviors, emotional outbursts and even physical issues could be secondary to the constantly open source of information flowing through them.

planet for a very long time. So, the human experience is both brand new and really still too dense for their full embodiment. That, however, did not prevent their souls from answering the call to be here now en masse.

It only takes about fifteen minutes in a room with an autistic individual to witness for yourself that they interact with other realms of consciousness. It is apparent in their behaviors that they see, hear and often speak to what is not experienced by others. This is often dismissed as some form of "mental illness," but this population is far from mentally ill. Like everyone on this amazing planet, they have their challenges, but their challenge, at its core, is not related to a mental and emotional disorder, but an expression of all that they have access to. With so few truly understanding this, their curiosity to explore their worlds is mistakenly interpreted as "disordered."

Now that we have a glimpse of their plight, here is a brief explanation of how they are checking off that soul level "to-do" list.

How is this population shifting the patriarchal energy? Today, mainstream science has already proven that the autistic brain functions intuitively versus cognitively. With a ratio of four boys currently being diagnosed with ASD to every girl, we now have more males who feel their way through life than think their way through. Moreover, many of them appear to have significant challenges with cognitive processing only because they do not engage with information in the same way as male generations that preceded them.

How is it that they are opening us up to buried skill sets?

There is no stronger imperative for someone to evolve than to bear a child with needs that you do not understand. It is part of human nature to protect our young. We all know that parents will do things for their children that they will not do for themselves. This is blatantly evident in my private consultations, and in every Awesomism class I have ever taught. Parents come to me because they have tried everything else. They open to me because it is often their only means to communicate with their child. The beautiful thing about this is that once that channel is open, the children begin to provide other extraordinary information, which, if explored, proves itself to the parent. I know this firsthand, because once I opened to telepathy, one child after another told me precisely what to do to support their integration process, and when I listened to every detail, they all became more present and functional in this reality.

The CCC has confirmed that parents of children with ASD have one of the greatest opportunities to fast track their evolution.

Now, let us look at how they are breaking familiar lineage patterns.

In typical childhood development, conception to birth and the first seven years of life are said to be a time of imprinting. This is where the patterns of the parents are passed onto the child. As stated earlier, children diagnosed with ASD have significant challenges embodying with all the subtle information that they are bringing with them. This serves them well regarding imprinting. The CCC has shared that the reason so many of them do not speak and/or “show up” until after the age of seven is to avoid this imprinting. If the child literally is “not there” to receive this information then instead of taking it on and carrying the pattern forward, they reflect that information back to their parents and energetically demand that they deal with it themselves. Thus, the parents are pushed to deal with long-buried issues. This can be extremely challenging. Every child provides their parent the opportunity to overcome their patterns by unconsciously reflecting those patterns back to the parent. However, because of the depth of subtle information they have access to, ASD children reflect with an intensity that can be overwhelming for the parent.

This leads me to the last of their “to do” list. As you might suspect, having a child diagnosed with ASD is all-encompassing. The challenges for parent and child would be overwhelming for less equipped souls, but for those who take the opportunity to evolve through the process, the gift is nothing short of miraculous.

What is on offer here, is that every resistance of the adults around these children can be broken down, patterns of control get released, programmed ways of staying “safe” or “one of the crowd” eventually have to go, to allow for parent and child to be the leaders in evolution that they came here to be. Basically, having a child with ASD provides the opportunity for our hearts to be reset. To survive the intensity, we have to come to a level of love, compassion and understanding, both for ourselves and these children, that matches the love they came here to offer to us. We offer this love and compassion, not because they are broken, but because they, just like all of us, are doing the best they can do with the vastness of information that they are attempting to integrate.

The parents and professionals that I have seen who are living extraordinary lives with this population have all taken this road, and as a result, they now know themselves beyond what most can imagine.

Autism as an Evolutionary Process

I can state unequivocally from experience that to allow these beautiful, wise souls to act as our teachers, instead of trying to fit them into ways of being that humanity is meant to be evolving out of, is a journey well worth taking. It is not for the faint of heart.

But then again, neither is any leadership role in the evolution of human consciousness. €
